recognition capacity is needed in order to perform tasks a recognition of when procedures apply further recognition capacity cannot be replaced by higher level procedures this creates an insurmountable barrier for guidebooks that attempt to provide step by step procedural accounts of task performance user guides will be most successful when they attempt to show novices how to perform procedural tasks however step by step user guides will be least successful when applied to

tasks involving recognitional capacity with the goal of developing high levels of proficiency the information gathered will be voluminous and difficult to present but will also be criticized as insufficient it is suggested that the way to overcome the barrier presented by recognitional capacity is by approaching it directly perhaps as a type of analogical inference rather than by trying to decompose it into more procedures author
