Encyclopedia of the American Short Story 2015-04-22 this dissertation examines the intersection of disability with race and gender in texts that seek to reconfigure or critique nationalism previous disability scholarship on the nation has viewed the nation as a concept predicated on the able body coinciding with feminist and anti racist critiques positing nationalism as a construct grounded in relations of domination in contrast this project asks what happens when cultural workers aligning themselves with liberatory social movements such as feminism the chicana o movement or struggles against globalization and in favor of democratization reexamine nationalism and citizenship through representations of disability it argues that although the reformulated nationalisms and transnational subjectivities presented in these texts do not always evade the problems associated with the idea of the nation notably its exclusionary constructions of citizenship there are nonetheless important ethical epistemological and political implications in the acts of claiming disability and of producing cultural texts that seek to construct communities based on that claim
